

A Day in the Life

It's a day unlike any other at school because it's a Time Travelers day...

Imagine your school turned into a time portal for just a few magical hours – Paul Revere strides down the hall, looking as though he's got something of great importance to tell the kids. He nods at a Pilgrim carrying a basket of Indian corn, as she enters a classroom. You might even open a door and catch Anne Sullivan showing the students how Helen Keller, her one and only student, first discovered language.

This do-it-yourself day has been put together by a handful of parents using the Time Travelers Living History manual. People like you, who delight in helping enrich their child's education, and love seeing a child's face light up with learning. On this day these parents may have helped John Muir into his vest and handed him his walking stick...or held a bottle of water for Thomas Jefferson as he prepared for his next group of 4th graders.

Every classroom will receive a visitor this day – someone out of the history books who has made an impact on our society, invented things, discovered medicines, created art, found new lands, offered constructive ideas for peace, or simply sewed the first American flag with 13 stars in a circle, establishing that all 13 colonies were created equal.

As these Time Travelers share their unique life and times with the kids; times that were very different from their own, one thing becomes apparent...the kids are hooked! The history bug has taken hold and it's evident on their faces. Teachers smile; everyone is excited by the sense of live theatre and the message these historical figures convey.

This is How It Works. This is a Time Travelers day.
